We have just read a real story from Lora/Ola/Tina/Max. Now, let us try to answer the following questions:

How did we initially interpret the story based on the illustration? According to us, what was happening in the illustration?

Has our initial interpretation of the illustration differed from the actual story which we subsequently read? If yes, in what specifically did our initial interpretation differ from the actual story?

....

What did we base our initial interpretation of the introductory illustration on? Which aspects of our initial interpretation were the most important to us?

....

During our interpretation of the introductory illustration, did any of our expectations, assumptions, or stereotypes play a role in influencing our perception of the illustration? If yes, which assumptions and/or stereotypes are we talking about?

....

Due to the illustration and the written story, has our perception of the relationship dynamics of people living with disabilities changed? Has it impacted our perception of their needs in relationships?

....

....

Was the actual story rewarding; did you learn something new?

....

....

After reading about these actual stories, did we learn a lesson that we may apply in our relationships as well?
